

Scenario

A student has been attending classes and activities but is consistently disengaged. During academic sessions, they keep their head down, do not participate, and occasionally put in headphones when the instructor is not directly addressing them.

During an afternoon workshop, the student tells their mentor, “I already know this stuff—I don’t see the point,” and refuses to participate in a group activity.

Later in the week, the instructor shares with staff that the student has not contributed to discussions, has not completed assigned work.

When approached, the student says, “I’m here, aren’t I? That should count for something.”

- Is this a violation or just a disengaged student? Why?
- At what point does lack of participation become a conduct issue?
